

SELL MORE

AS AN UNTETHERED SELLER

The Untethering Process

A moment to practice courage, collect evidence, and pay attention to what the experience teaches you.

IMAGINE THIS

There's something selling is asking you to do that you've been avoiding, delaying, or overthinking. Maybe it's making the call, talking about what you sell, following up again, being seen, saying your price, asking for the business, or staying present when you can't control someone else's reaction. Instead of asking whether you feel ready, consider this: what is this asking you to practice?

What the Untethered Seller knows:

The Untethered Seller knows that confidence doesn't always come before courageous action. Sometimes confidence develops because she practices courage while it is still uncomfortable. The activity is not always the point; the tether is. She practices the capacity the sale will require, collects evidence, learns, adjusts, and goes again.

Now, turn the reflection toward yourself.

01

What is selling asking you to do right now that your tether has historically taught you to avoid?

02

What are you actually practicing underneath that activity—and what courageous action will you take?

After you act, come back and ask: What evidence did I collect—and what is it teaching me about the woman I'm becoming?
